Role B: The Investment Manager, West Africa.

Your bank should back the Senegalese irrigation and water supply project political stability is better in Senegal, than in most African countries.

The President is a strong man and democratically elected the country badly needs this project to stop the advance of the Sahara desert and half of the money will come from the World Bank, the local currency has only been devalued once since independence in 1960 as investors are reluctant to consider Senegal, because economic growth is practically nil. The rate of return would be higher than on any other project, and would be guaranteed by the European Union.

The water would be used mainly to irrigate new farms and market gardens, and its supply would become profitable within a year.

You are against the Malaysian project because it is very costly and the currency has been very unstable in recent years, you also feel that because you have already invested in major projects in Malaysia, it would be more prudent to invest in other parts of the world now.
